

COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS AND SCIENCES

English

UMaine's ADVANTAGE

- Recent graduates have found jobs with the New York Public Library, the FBI, and Teach for America
- Each year we host upward of 20 visiting poets, fiction writers and scholars who teach classes, meet informally with students and give readings
- Home to the National Poetry Foundation

WHY STUDY ENGLISH AT UMAINE?

We are devoted to literature as a living tradition and a dynamic contemporary enterprise, and to writing as a way of knowing, a means of connecting and one of the most powerful inventions in human history. In addition to studying classic and contemporary literature, English majors can pursue interests in writing, theory, minority studies and gender studies. They gain insight into the complexities of human experience, appreciation of our cultural heritage, openness to different ways of thinking and feeling, and awareness of how language shapes reality. They also hone their abilities to think critically and to communicate their views and visions. Every year, our department hosts upward of 20 visiting poets, fiction writers and scholars who teach classes, meet informally with students and give readings. The department is also home to the National Poetry Foundation, which is internationally known for its publications and conferences on modern and postmodern poetry. As a result, our students gain a sophisticated understanding of the contemporary literary scene, which carries over into their own creative and critical work. The department is a welcoming place, with the Ulrich Wicks Reading Room providing a quiet, comfortable study space.

OUR UNDERGRADUATE PROGRAM

All our classes are small and writing-intensive; students get to know one another and their professors through lively discussion. Our curriculum covers a range of literature from Chaucer to avant-garde fiction. In addition, every student develops an expertise in analytical writing, creative writing or professional writing. Many English faculty and students participate in the Honors College, and top students may train to work as peer tutors in our nationally recognized Writing Center.

OUR GRADUATE PROGRAM

Our master's program emphasizes intensive work in small seminars. The curriculum combines traditional period courses with constantly changing topics courses related to faculty research interests. Assistantships offer qualified students the opportunity to gain teaching experience while funding their studies. Recent M.A. graduates have been offered full funding at excellent Master of Fine Arts and Ph.D. programs around the country.

OUR FACULTY

Most classes for the major are taught by full-time faculty who are active scholars and writers. Our faculty have won awards for research, teaching and advising, and for service to the profession. Tenured faculty teach at all levels of the curriculum, from first-year courses to graduate seminars.

WHAT CAN I DO WITH AN ENGLISH DEGREE?

People with English degrees tend to work in three broad areas:

- Teaching and educational administration
- Business, management, government and law
- Publishing, editing, public relations, professional writing and information science

The English major is excellent preparation for law school or graduate school; as a second major or minor, it pairs well with any other area of study.

OPPORTUNITIES TO EXCEL

The department sponsors contests in poetry, fiction, playwriting, professional writing, and the academic essay. Outstanding students compete for Kelly Scholarships in creative writing, the Nellie Ruth Pillsbury King Memorial Scholarship, the Hill Scholarship
